Ludwig Meyer, who had come third in the German championship, also had a chance to take part in this world championship, especially since Germany was the organizer. However, a ban by the National Socialists made this impossible. Meyer emigrated to Cuba during the fascist regime and only returned to Hamburg in 1949.

The NSDAP's rise to power also led to the cancellation of the expected mass visitors from the Netherlands and Belgium. Whether the absence of Francis S. Appleby (USA) as well as Albert Corty and Jacques Davin from France were connected with this can only be speculated.

The billiards were electrically heated, which was already known at that time but quite not common.
